Dear Petrescu-Mag Ioan Valentin

CABI recently reviewed your publication(s):

Title: ELBA Bioflux

ISSN: 2066-7671 (e-ISSN: 2067-6360 )

in our Quarterly Review. We evaluated the journal(s) according to our internal selection criteria of potential yield, scientific value and geographic origin and judged its content to be both novel and important, and deemed to be very relevant to the CAB Abstracts database produced by CABI. Consequently, I am writing to request a gratis subscription (1 copy) of the publication(s) to enable abstracting and indexing of future issues as published.

CABI is a not-for-profit, international treaty organisation, dedicated to the dissemination of scientific knowledge. CABI produces two abstract databases in the applied life sciences: CAB Abstracts and Global Health. Our organisation has a long established reputation in indexing scientific literature, with electronic archives containing records dating back to 1913.

As a not-for-profit organisation, CABI is heavily dependent upon the generosity of publishers to supply us with copies of their publications. In return, CABI can help to promote the visibility of the indexed journal to global users of the databases worldwide. The CAB Abstracts and Global Health databases are used to identify relevant literature by Government and International agencies, academic institutions and commercial organisations worldwide. Global users of the databases can easily alert themselves to relevant articles in their field of interest, which in turn results in them acquiring the full text from the original source. The journal homepage url and DOI (where available) are included in CABI's indexing records for this purpose.

Both databases place a strong emphasis on indexing non-English language material, appreciating the wealth of scientific research being generated outside the English-speaking world. Consequently, this gives the databases truly global relevance and provides worldwide publicity to the indexed titles. Indexed publications are included in the 'Serials cited' list on the CABI website, which is updated quarterly, and CABI would invite you to cite your journal as being indexed in the CAB Abstracts database.
